> Later came the formation of neighborhood gangs, of which there have been great numbers for many years and some of which continue, after a fashion. Among them may be mentioned the Cherry Hill gang, the Jones's Wood gang, the Gas House gang and the San Juan Hill gang. All these have offered distinctive characteristics and have given more or less trouble to the authorities, though none of them has presented any such problem as that of the Mafia or that of the organisation of blackmailers which for a little while past has made such serious trouble

The oath bound secrets of the Mafia, well known to exist, but hard to discover and the equally well guarded hidder methods of the so-called cadets and white slavers present a variety of problems which have not yet found satisfactory solutions, but which have been brought into prominence by the recent outbreak. That these modern gangs exist has been

It would be convincing if they would listen to the policeman, and in a good many cases the court is really convinced, but for technical reasons the policeman can't be heard, and the prisoner goes back to his work. So it does not seem to me that the new method works as well as the old one did."

MILES OF PEAT DEPOSITS

If the deposits of coal in the United States ever become exhausted the consumer may fall back on peat, a fuel supply as yet undeveloped. It is estimated that the peat deposits in this country cover an area of at least 11,000 square miles, and that they contain the enormous total of 13,000,000,000 tons.

Peat has been in extensive use in many of the countries of Europe, notably Ireland, Holland, Germany, Russia. France and Austria, for several cen-

In the United States peat deposits are found in the New England and other Northern States, along the Atlantic coast, in Texas, and on the Pacific coast. In parts of Massachusetts and Rhode Island may still be seen traces of abandoned peat bogs from which early Colonial settlers obtained their fuel supply. As means of transportation increased coal came into gradual use and finally caused the mining of peat to be discontinued almost entirely. Peat is partly decomposed and disintegrated vegetable matter. Its origin is similar to that of coal, though the period of time required for its formation is considerably less. It varies in color from brown to black, and in texture is coarse and porous or light and spongy When exposed to the air for drying it crumbles and is therefore difficult to transport for any distance unless converted into bricks.

Peat abounds only in wet or marshy lands. The beds are nearly always found just below the surface of the ground, and for that reason the cost of mining is comparatively small. No expensive machinery is required for taking it out, and there are no attending dangers as in the case of coal mining. For commercial purposes it is converted, in its plastic state, into bricks by machinery. After drying in the open air for several days the bricks are ready for shipment. A ton of peat thus treated commands about half the price of a ton of coal, but it is said that even the best grade of coal has not twice the heating grade of coal has not twice the heating value of peat.

As might be inferred from its kinship to coal, peat has a number of bypreducts of commercial importance, such as dyes, ammonia and tanning materials. Experiments are now under way by chemists looking to the fuller development of this potential asset in the wealth of the world.

As one of the natural resources of the United States peat is bound to occupy a place well to the front in years to confeit is a cheap source of heat and power, easily mined and readily changed into a safe form for transportation, and some idea of its prominence in the future commerce of the world may be gained from the fact that experts estimate its total value at $40,000,000,000.
